

Katya has to go through the Russian Revolution as a aristocrat and a peasant. When Mama and Katya return to the Oakes, the only way to get there is a train. The highest class in the train was filthy. It was squished and people could not get a breath of their own air. (pg. 253) Katya's political opinions also changed a lot by the end of the novel. She still loves the Tsar but knows he made lot's of mistakes politically. When she is a peasant at Nina and Stepan's house, she realizes what the peasants had to go through everyday. Fortunately she was not beaten.

Katya had to sleep on shelves and eat tea and porridge. (pg 269) Katya did change a lot throughout the novel and now knows what is right about her country.

Katya's political opinions and lifestyle was changed through the novel, Angel on the Square. She began as a pretty, sort of stuck-up child but became a thoughtful teenager who gets the idea of the problems and wonders of Russia. Katya, by the end leaves her mother with Nina and Stepan to go live with Mishka in the country. Now you know how Katya felt throughout her lifetime during the Russian Revolution.
